Commentary

The EHP Advantage International Fund Class “F” units increased 2.0% for month of May, versus a loss of -0.7% for the MSCI EAFE Index. Gains came primarily from the long side of the portfolio, with each region contributing despite weakness in Japan and European indices. Short positions were essentially flat on the month overall. Low Volatility strategies made money in Europe, in contrast to the rest of the world, as a sudden flight-to-safety bid to defensive stocks followed renewed political turmoil in Italy. Our Credit strategy was stopped out of European high yield debt early in the month, as once again the most risk-sensitive part of the bond market was a good leading indicator for the equity volatility that followed a few weeks later.

May was another volatile month from a macro perspective, with equities, interest rates, commodity prices (particularly crude) and currencies all experiencing large moves intra-month. Globally, market returns were mixed with North American indices posting strong returns, while most other markets, including Eurozone and EM ended down, as a combination of sluggish economic data, trade issues, strong USD, and political noise contributed to weaker markets. Growth and momentum stocks once again led returns around the globe, best evidenced by the tech-heavy NASDAQ up 5.5% for the month. While high-beta stocks continue to see a persistent bid, their low-beta brethren, dominated by high yielding/dividend names, continue to come under pressure. In an encouraging signal for markets, breadth widened out beyond FAANG-like stocks as small caps hit new highs during May.

With sentiment surrounding the energy sector improving, we have been fielding a lot of questions of how our funds are positioned for further sector strength. For the better part of the last two years, we have benefited from having been generally net short energy stocks, given they were both expensive and declining. As of late however, energy stocks are increasingly exhibiting attributes that we look for, namely; attractive valuations and positive price momentum. As a result, we have seen short covering while incrementally adding names to the long side of our portfolio, leaving our funds, on average, net long for the first time in a while. We are of the view that should crude prices hold or move higher, the sector is in the early stages of a considerable move higher and that our positioning will adapt to participate as our process identifies more names to own. If earnings revisions are any indication of potential, it is worth noting that energy stocks are the strongest of all sectors on that measure.

We entered May recognizing that there were some “green shoots” in terms of sentiment and trend improvement following the February correction. With markets continuing recent strength, our tactical indicators had us shifting our exposures higher, leaving us “risk on” across all markets and most strategies as we enter June. We recognize that investors are struggling with where we are in this unconventional cycle, reconciling near term data that suggests no fear of an imminent recession, while recognizing that we are long in the tooth for this bull run. While we have held the view for some time that markets were late-cycle, expensive and overbought, the combination of the market pullback and strong recent earnings has left valuations considerably more reasonable. While we still believe we are late cycle, we are probably not “end of cycle”, and this market may yet have another leg higher over the balance of the year. Regardless of whether this move higher turns out to be short lived or has a lot further to go, we stick to our rules based process, which for the time being has our funds with overall exposures and risk levels at the higher end of their targeted ranges.
